A TALISMAN OF BRASS.

By GLENN ROY M'CLINTOCK.

N old log house stuck on the slope of a West Virginia hill, and a cornfield, which looked as though it might, at any time, slip off into the valley below, was the heritage which fell to Sarah McCoy and her daughter Elizabeth upon the death of the husband and father, Henry Stonewall McCoy, Had his bequest been of a more pretentious nature Elizabeth and Jim Gardner, long since betrothed, would not, in all probability, have been sitting on the worn stoop gloomily trying to figure out a means to circumvent the difficulties that enthralled their matri-

The beauty of the night did not appeal to them. The sea of moonlight and the mystic shadows below them, the humble family burying ground in its depths, from which arose a shaft of spectral white marole, were all stern reality; an unproductive valley, a grave yard in which father, grandfather and greatgrandfather lie buried, a bit of marble that repesented the savings of year.

The notes of a whip-poor-will floating across the hills, the answering call of its mate, from the distance, here no sentiment or romance to them. They were the discordant cries of a very ordinary bird. "Liz?" without looking around

"Liz?" "What Jim?" Short pause, and then:
"I be goin' away." More silence. "Where he you goin', Jim?" Presently he answered:

"No tellin' when you'll be back, I s'pose?" "I 'low not." Long silence again.

"Jim?" "What?"

"Take this with you," and she drew from the pocket of her homespun a brass button that had graced the rebel uniform once worn by her father and handed it to him. He took it slowly and holding it in the palm of his hand examined it curiously.

"What's it for, Liz?" 'It's a tal-talisman.'

The blank look on his face showed that she had proounded a mystery that was too much for him to "It means good luck." (Pause.) "I read about it in

He shuffled to his feet, took a couple of steps and satd:

"Good-by.

She watched him go down the winding path until "What is it, Jim?" after a pause. Another wait and his figure was lost in the rising fog from the vailey below, then turned slowly and disappeared into the

In the course of three years the oil industry in West Virginia had assumed unthought-of proportions and the Standard Oil Company had begun to extend its operations into the interior of the State. Farms that could have been bought before for $2 an here were bringing thousands and were eagerly sought at those prices. The oil belt, extending southeasterly was thought to cross the farm owned by Liz and her mother. An eastern syndicate, having paid them a big price for an oil lease and allowed a royalty, had erected a derrick and the clanging of the jars was now heard in the nearby cornfield.

It had never occurred to Liz that her lover would not return. She knew he would and was content to wait. When the day arrived on which the well was to be shot she was filled with an inexplicable feeling that a crisis was at hand. The "shooter" had been ordered from Wheeling and would arrive some time that afternoon. She resolved to watch for him, as her view from the cabin commanded the road up the valley over which he must come. Presently her vigilance was rewarded. A stout wagon, drawn by two tired horses, appeared on the road from around which the weather clerk has been disthe base of a hill. She could see the driver urging pensing liberally to his brothers on the his jaded beasts over the rough, broken road until a street level. The few warm nights of d inits course and a thicket hid them from view.

He did not reappear and she was wondering if an accident had occurred, when, from the very spot she was watching, a shaft of dirt, stones and parts of a buggy shot high into the air, followed immediately by an explosion so loud and terrific that it seemed the hills must be torn from their rock foundations. The wagon-load of treacherous nitro-glycerine had exploded, an occurrence not uncommon in the oil-fields. As she sat, dazed and bewildered, watching the flying debris fall to the earth, an object dropped at her

She stooped and picked it up-a brass button, blackened and bent. That evening Liz discerned a familiar figure ap proaching the house. She did not move from her seat on the stoop, but, as it drew near, said quietly:

"Hello, Jim. "Hello, Liz. "When did ye get back?"

"T'day." "Jim.

"What?"

"Here's yer button."

"Thank ye." (Pause.) "Lowed I'd lost it. Left my coat on the wagon seat while I went to water the horses. Bin in my coat pocket bout three years now.

"Low we kin marry now, Liz." "Low we kin." Another pause, and then "When?"

'T'morrow, I low.' "All right, Good-night, Liz."
"Good-night, Jim."

Theodore McKim, the Kansas City suspect run down by a lot of Atchison farmers, had his preliminary examination the other day, and was bound over to the District Court on the charge of burglarizing an Atchison County farmhouse, says the Kansas City Journal Robert Christian, one of the farmers testified that he captured McKim. "What are you arresting me for?" asked Mc-"What are you running for?"
